Thoughts of St. Ignatius of Loyola

- * God would readily give us much greater graces if our perverse wills did not stand in the way of his bounty.
- * All of us are bound by a common obligation to rejoice in the good and profit of God's image, which he redeemed with the precious Blood of his only begotten Son.
- * So that our handling of great affairs may go as we wish, the smallest concerns are to be sent before them, that so we may ask for the great ones the help of him who gives grace to the humble.
- * God's supreme goodness, mighty love, and fatherly care are more ready freely to bestow perfection on us than we are to seek it out.
- * The evils of the soul arise from excess, whether of lukewarmness or of fervor.
- * Rare indeed are good workmen of the kind that seek not their own things, but the things of Jesus Christ.
- * It often happens that others' works are impeded for our sake, when we ought to manifest our own to others.
